ABSTRACT

This annotated research, bibliographic and resource guide to current literature on the Hispanic elderly is divided into six major sections. The first section contains a bibliography of bibliographies, books and book chapters, conference papers, journal articles, dissertations, theses, and program descriptions. Part two contains a directory of general information sources on gerontology and aging and a listing of government documents pertinent to the field. Sections three and four include a list of gerontology centers and national gerontology service organizations respectively. Section five includes a list of newsletters and periodicals relating to research, practice, services and training, and popular and consumer issues. The final section represents a selected bibliography on general gerontology as well as on Hispanic aging. Included are publications on physical and mental health, housing, employment, education, crime, legal issues, nutrition, retirement, social services, transportation, and other topics as they relate to aging. Introduction to the Bibliographic Guide

Gerontology is a relatively new field. The study of minority older persons is even newer. Serious research on the needs and status of the minority elderly, and programs to meet those unique needs, have begun only in the past ten years or so. During that time, studies about the Hispanic elderly have started to remedy the lack of knowledge about this group. Studies dealing with Hispanics and using empirical methods of the social and behavioral sciences have increased in number throughout the past decade. In most cases, this has been the result of greater numbers of Hispanics entering the field of gerontology and concentrating on their own kind. But interest in research on Hispanics is still peripheral in the general gerontological community. The rapid growth of the Hispanic population means that more research on this group must and will be done.

The data base on older Hispanics is not yet extensive. Nor has this data been systematized. Summarizing and categorizing the data base are important steps in deciding the direction of future research about the Hispanic elderly.

This research, bibliographic, and resource guide is the first publication to take these steps. It unites in one place a comprehensive annotated listing of available contemporary literature on the Hispanic elderly. The guide is meant to help researchers, service deliverers, and policymakers to formulate relevant studies and policies concerning Hispanic elders.

The guide was made possible by a grant from the Administration on Aging of the Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, D.C. It was compiled by extensive computerized and manual searches in university and professional libraries and holdings on gerontology. It covers the period from 1970-1980, and thus includes most of the literature on the Hispanic elderly. The guide lists books, chapters in books, articles in journals and other periodicals, theses and dissertations, government documents and reports, study findings, proceedings of meetings and conferences held in the past decade, and other bibliographies that will guide the user to more sources.

Also included are a listing of pertinent programs and studies in progress or recently completed in the field of Hispanic gerontology and data bases and publications in the field.

The data bases searched included: Service Center for Aging Information (SCAN), Andrus Gerontology Exchange (AGEX), National Archive of Computerized Data on Aging (NACDA), National Clearing House on Mental Aging (NCMH), Med-Line (MESH), National Technical Information (NTIS), Psychological Abstracts (Psyc), Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC), Social Science Citation Index (SSCI), Public Affairs Information Guide (PAIS), Dissertation Abstracts (DISS). Several libraries in the Los Angeles area were also extremely useful in the manual searches.

The Asociacion Nacional Pro Personas Mayores (National Association for Hispanic Elderly) is pleased to publish this research, bibliographic, and resource guide to the Hispanic elderly. The guide represents a significant contribution to the state of the art on older Hispanics and to the Asociacion's goal of articulating and responding to the needs of the Hispanic elderly in the U.S. The guide's comprehensiveness reflects the Asociacion's unique commitment as the only national organization serving all segments of the older Hispanic population: Cubans, Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans, Central and South Americans, and others.

We wish to thank the project's principal investigator, Dr. Carlos Vasquez, for his excellent work in compiling the guide. We also acknowledge the fine research assistance of Antonio Rios and Maria Ortiz. Mr. Stewart Greathouse and Ms. Margaret Kronauer of the Ethel Percy Andrus Gerontology Center helped very much with the data searches. Special appreciation is due Mr. Henry Rodriguez, the Asociacion's Research Manager, for coordinating the project.

The Asociacion Nacional hopes that this guide generates further knowledge and programs that will improve the well-being of the Hispanic elderly throughout the U.S. In this way, the guide can help assure that Hispanics will achieve a dignified and comfortable old age.

I. ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY ON THE HISPANIC ELDERLY

The following annotated bibliography encompasses a wide variety of sources of information on older Hispanics: bibliographies, books, journal articles, conference proceedings, dissertations, aging-related projects, and other sources. The Asociacion has included many kinds of information resources in order to make this bibliography thorough. A desire to provide information on all segments of the older Hispanic population -- Mexican-Americans, Cubans, Puerto Ricans, Central and South Americans, and others -- guided the compilation of the annotated bibliography.

BALKEMA, JOHN B. The Aged in Minority Groups: A Bibliography. Washington, D.C.: National Council on the Aging, Inc., 1973.

ANNOTATION:

Covers Jews, Asians, Indians, Blacks, and Spanish-speaking groups treated in books, journal articles, agency reports, and conference proceedings. Material treats work done in late 1960 and 1970 and, while there are key items in each section, the bibliography itself is limited in both number of citations and coverage of any one topic or group. Topics include employment, health, income, housing, and family life (annotated).

ANNOTATION:

A study of aged Mexican-Americans' participation in an East Los Angeles voluntary association. By putting his subject in the historical and socioeconomic context of Mexican-Americans in this country, the author is able to offer convincing explanations for both the relatively low number of elderly involved in this kind of association and the type of behavior observed in the study. Looking at voluntary association as groupings of two kinds -- the "network constructor" and the "companion seeker" -- the author studies deference patterns, conflict, and accommodation in a particular case study.

Citing lack of adequate sociological theory to explain Chicano problems in U.S. society, the author examines factors that separate the Mexican-American elderly from their majority counterparts. The extended family, and its changing structure, the attachment to the land (rural or urban), and social mobility are examined to explain the relative lack of attention Hispanic gerontology problems have received. ASOCIACION NACIONAL PRO PERSONAS MAYORES. Search for Hispanic Models, Final Report, the First Western Regional Conference on Aging, Los Angeles, 1976.

ANNOTATION:

Objectives of the conference were: (1) to identify the needs of Latino elderly in the United States; (2) to identify processes of service delivery that take into account cultural attributes of the elderly upon which program models can be developed. The proceedings highlight the issues of service delivery to Latino elderly, as well as the need for bilingual, bicultural personnel.

NEWQUIST, DEBORAH, et al. Prescription for Neglect: Experience of Older Blacks and Mexican-Americans with the American Health Care System, Los Angeles, Andrus Gerontology Center, USC, 1979.

ANNOTATION:

Focuses on the health care experiences of older Blacks and Mexican-Americans and presents information drawn from two surveys taken in 1974. One involved interviews with 1269 Black, Mexican-American, and White Los Angeles County residents. The second elicited opinions of 316 decision-makers who influence, formulate, or implement policies affecting Los Angeles County residents. Analyzes and examines the availability, accessibility, and appropriateness in meeting needs of older Mexican-Americans and Blacks, and is designed for use by policy-makers, planners, advocates, and service providers.

The project's purpose, reported here, was to demonstrate to California service providers that, without funding vast new resources, feasible and practical ways can be devised to assist the "invisible" population of the elderly ex-migrant and seasonal farmworker. The major objective was to develop and operate, over three funding periods, a statewide bilingual information and referral service for the specific needs of the elderly migrant farm worker, most of whom are Hispanic.

ANNOTATION:

An examination of the hyppthesis that being at once a woman, a Mexican-American, and aged constitutes the "triple risk" of neglect, discrimination and exploitation. ANNOTATION:

A needs assessment based on a 1977 survey conducted in Austin to determine the effectiveness of the Texas Department of Human Resources' delivery and to obtain data on the social and cultural characteristics of urban Mexican-American elderly. The data were based on interviews with 163 SSI income recipients, 65 or older. The study found that 63% believed that governmental agencies exchanged information on clients, which was seen as some indication of why some are reluctant to request social services; that isolation is one of the major problems facing the elderly; and that half were dissatisfied with their assigned case worker.

Part of a larger cross-cultural study of minority elders in San Diego County, which took over two years (1974-1976) and concerned itself with seven other minority groups. The research design had five components: (1) a composite overview of the study area; (2) creation of a community sanction and consultation network; (3) selection and training of community interviewers; (4) a study population tailored to local conditions; and (5) procedures to accommodate local linguistic factors. Reports the study of under-utilization by Mexican-Americans of public housing for the elderly in one city. Inspite of efforts to design the architecture according to anthropological notions of the kind of housing Mexicans "need," it was found that Mexican society makes staying with relatives more desirable than living among seniors. ANNOTATION:

Argues that present health services for Chicanos are a "mockery of quality" care, and that referrals to supplement these services increase the credibility gap that now exists between health professionals and the Chicano community. Finds that current programs suffer from (1) Anglo middle-class lack of empathy for and confusion about Chicanos, (2) methods of service delivery at odds with existing structures in the Chicano community, (3) lack of a well-defined perspective in providing Chicanos comprehensive health care.

ANNOTATION:

Examines the cultural discontinuities among elder Anglos and Mexican-Americans that produce low self-esteem when they must adopt to the expectations of others in their age group. Concludes that there is a tendency in Western cultures to reward one group of people at the expense of another. In the case study presented, a Mexican matriarch's sense of pride, power, and freedom are won only at psychological cost to her children. To insure the mother's self-esteem they must remain dependent children -- even into middle age.

ANNOTATION:

Reports findings on (1) how Mexican-Americans view old age, and (2) how they perceive three primary institutions which furnish informal or formal aid programs: the family, the Church, and the government. Data were gathered through interviews in the homes of respondents, all of whom were interviewed in Spanish by Mexican-Americans to increase cultural and language rapport. Old age was viewed negatively, and respondents reported less help from family than from Church or government. ANNOTATION:

The position that minority aged suffer from "double jeopardy" in society because of their ethnicity plus their age may be seriously qualified by the other positions that the gap between minority and Anglo closes as both advance in age. Reveals that cultural values represent an important factor in nursing home use. Underutilization of nursing homes by Mexican-Americans in the Phoenix, Arizona, area was studied from three data sources: 1970 Census Information; statewide vital statistics; and a mail-back questionnaire of state licensed nursing homes. ANNOTATION:

Reports a study of Blacks', Mexican-Americans', and Anglos' concepts of mental health and their willingness to pursue action to insure it. Using both "Angst" and "joy" scores in the analysis, tentative conclusions indicated that Mexican-Americans and Blacks seem to have as good mental health as Anglos. Concludes that age and ethnic differences relate not only to treatment but to the physician's evaluation of patients. Also, outreach programs are more likely to succeed if they have support and cooperation of the community.

ANNOTATION:

Studies attitudes toward old age in Black, Cuban, American Indian, White, and Chicano women to identify factors that may produce negative views of aging. ANNOTATION:

Investigates psychological distress in a sample of elderly Mexican-Americans and Anglos residing in a four-census tract area, in the southwest area of San Antonio, Texas. Comparison of the two ethnic groups, which use computer-derived mental health ratings as the measure of psychological distress show that Mexican-Americans exhibit more distress than Anglos. TORRES-GIL, and MONA NEGROM. "Policy Issues Concerning the Hispanic Elderly," Aging, Nos. 305-306, March-April, 1980, pp. 2-5.

ANNOTATION:

Focuses on the Federal Council on the Aging and its work in dealing with the issues of service delivery, support network, education, employment, housing, health, language barriers, etc., among Latino elderly. Concludes that among other things, the socio-economic barriers encountered by the Hispanic elderly, added to their cultural differences, may make the Hispanic elderly more dependent on a national support network than their White counterparts.

ANNOTATION:

Studies political behavior among two samples of Mexican-American elderly in San Jose and Los Angeles, California. The findings show that the Mexican-American elderly have a relatively low rate of political activity and a diminished sense of efficacy. The authors discuss factors leading to this political behavior -- fear, lack of communication, socio-economic status --, and posit that increased participation by Mexican-American elderly in social and political activity would mean increased potential for organizing around relevant issues to gain a greater influence on decisions, policies, and events affecting their lives.

Selected subjects from Old Age Assistance lists and from personal referrals. Explores five propositions about the perceptions of grandparents: (1) they perceive themselves as important in raising grandchilren; (2) they feel a sense of responsibility when crisis hits the family; (3) they see themselves as having credible authority in the family; (4) they perceive grandmothers as responsible for the grandchildren's religious training; and (5) they see themselves as responsible for cultural transmission. The purpose of this project was to conduct research on the need of "viejitos" to develop program models that could demonstrate and refine programmatic approaches for meeting the needs of Chicano elderly. It also aimed at preparing those presently being served to become involved in policy-making, administration, and delivery of services.

The program has four phases: (1) to expand the presently inadequate body of knowledge on the needs of the Chicano elderly -- for example, changing demographic, economic, and social characteristics of the older Chicano; (2) to utilize research findings for developing new programmatic strategies; (3) to demonstrate and refine new programmatic approaches, to implement model program developed in Step 2; and (4) to make data available to other organizations working on the problems of the aging.

The hypothesis to be proved by this project was as follows: if a departure can be made from the usual state agency approach; and if a task force method can be employed at the local, community level for determining needs, priorities and recommendations; and if, through direct communication between state and local levels, action can be generated toward meeting needs; then more adequate and realistic services will be provided at both community and state levels. The project continued for only two out of the projected three years -- not enough time for the efforts of the project to bear fruit. It appears nonetheless that the hypotheses of the project were not disproved by the results, if they were not proved either.

II. DATA AND INFORMATION BASES

The Asociacion Nacional searched the following data bases in compiling this section of the Guide:

Service Center for Aging Information (SCAN), Andrus Gerontology Exchange (AGEX), National Archive of Computerized Data on Aging (NACDA), National Clearing-House on Mental Aging (NCMH), Med-Line (MESH), National Technical Information (NTIS), Psychological Abstracts (Psyc), Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC), Social Science Citation Index (SSCI), Public Affairs Information Guide (PAIS), and Dissertation Abstracts (DISS). In addition, several libraries in the Los Angeles area were extremely helpful in our manual searches.

These data bases are useful sources for information about aging in general, as well as Hispanic gerontology. Government organizations that deal with aging are included in this section.

We attempted to be as comprehensive as possible in the data base search; nevertheless, we recognize that the above list does not contain all sources of data on the Hispanic elderly.

REYNOSO, CRUZ, and PETER D. COPPELMAN. Proposals to Eliminate Legal Barriers Affecting Elderly Mexican-Americans, a working paper prepared for the Special Committee on Aging of the U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C., Government Printing Office, 1972.

ANNOTATION:

Deals with legal barriers to eligibility and full utilization of federal programs by elderly Mexican-Americans. Focuses on issues of low income and health, indicating that services may be inaccessible because of a variety of factors, which include lack of transportation, poor health, language barriers, or the attitudes of those providing the services.
